

Trees give oxygen. They provide homes, warmth, food and sweet air. Some believe that trees have souls. They are connected to a web of life above and below. They do provide life and shelter to many creatures.

I've recently wondered are there enough left? Math is not my thing, at all. But, I wonder how many trees does it take to provide enough oxygen for a normal human life span? Times 7 billion. Don't forget all the creatures that need to breathe as well. Are there enough left? At what point does it tip over to not enough?

The fact that I have to even think about this is disgusting. News flash to the human race-we are killing ourselves and every other living entity on this planet. By what right do we have to destroy all life on EARTH? What about our children-our grandchildren-our posterity?

Does our greed mean more than their lives?

How much is enough? We have poisoned the air, the water, and the soil.

Wake up and smell the death coming for us all if we don't change and NOW.

We will extinct ourselves and Mother Earth will heal without us, scarred but viable. Perhaps some animals, birds, and fish survive but we won't.

The nightmare our children will face is unknown to us all but no doubt in their pain and agony they will curse us and our stupidity and greed.

That will be our legacy.
